The Finances of the CNBC have also taken a turn for the better. The last 4 years have been very difficult as a result of the transition of NAMB funds from non-church planting ministries to church planting expenditures. This obliged the CNBC to make up for approximately $500,000 a year to continue the ministries to our churches they had received in the past. This was accomplished by reducing costs, more efficient staff allocations, and a complete re-evaluation of all CNBC expenditures.

In 2014 we saw a significant reduction ($150,000) of our reserve because of the adjustment necessary to make up for the transition of NAMB funds to church planting causes. The good news is that this year while continuing to provide those significant ministries to our churches we have turned the financial loss around and have ended 2015 with a surplus of around $40,000. The Cooperative Program has also increased and as of the end of April we have received almost $40,000 more than over the same time last year.

We have also begun a process to restructure our relationships with our regional associations and I am absolutely convinced that these new relationships will streamline the work of the CNBC nationally and regionally. This restructuring will make us much more effective at ministering to our CNBC churches and will also result in the creation of much needed full and part-time field staff for existing churches.

The last few years have brought major financial challenges to the CNBC. Our convention has responded to those challenges in a positive and optimistic manner. The future of the CNBC is bright and we will look on these days as times when God was faithful and brought us through tough times while continuing to bless this movement. We owe Him all the glory.
